PERSONAL USE EXCEPTIONS FOR ROAMING WITH BLACKBERRY EQUIPMENT

The guide below sets out findings regarding personal use exceptions for roaming with “BlackBerry Equipment”, which includes the following items:

- a BlackBerry Device running BlackBerry Device Software (including the BlackBerry 10 operating system).
- a laptop running BlackBerry Desktop Software or BlackBerry Link.
- a BlackBerry Smart Card Reader.

Please note that the guide below is intended to cover import and export law as it applies to encryption hardware and software like the BlackBerry Equipment. The guide does not cover other areas of law, including but not limited to type approval, communications interception for law enforcement, or generally-applicable customs / immigration procedures.

Also, please note that the guide is not an exhaustive guide on personal use exceptions for roaming with BlackBerry Equipment. That is, there may be additional countries that have a personal use exception for roaming with BlackBerry Equipment that are not in the guide. In most countries, either a personal use exception is available or there is no specific regulation of encryption. The use of certain terms is important in interpreting the guide; “BlackBerry Roaming” refers to travel both to and from a country by an individual carrying the BlackBerry Equipment. The term (and the guide) does not cover restrictions on general commercial imports or exports of encryption products, or provisions to the public of an encryption-based service.

“Personal Use” refers to personal use by a traveler, including use in connection with business activities. For a personal use exception to apply, the BlackBerry Equipment must remain under the traveler’s control – e.g. the exception would not apply if the equipment were transferred from one traveler to another, or shipped or sent by mail. Further, the exception does not often apply in the following circumstances:

1. when an individual is travelling with more than one BlackBerry Device or more than one laptop loaded with BlackBerry software;
2. when an individual is travelling with BlackBerry Equipment and such equipment is intended for commercial demonstration or sale purposes (including demonstration or sale of the hardware itself or of software loaded on it); or
3. when the software or the BlackBerry Equipment is intended to be transferred to another user or loaded on another computer or device (including a user or computer affiliated with the traveler).

Where encryption is regulated and there is no applicable personal use exception, travelers may be legally required to obtain authorisation for temporary imports/exports of BlackBerry Equipment.

The information below has been gathered, as appropriate, from the following sources: a network of international trade lawyers, regulators and other government contacts in these countries, the U.S. Commercial Service, local embassies, contacts at the OECD, UNCITRAL and other international organisations and several publications.
